Important information about professional credentials:

Because of systematic limitation of the internet, this website may communicate information about credentials that are not approved in all states or jurisdictions. Thus, we remind clients that although a credential may represent the evidence of an ethics certification and ongoing educational efforts by a representative, no credential can guarantee that a representative is the best advisor for you. Before doing business with any investment professional, all investors should check with their state securities and insurance regulators to determine whether the individual is properly licensed and if there have been any complaints or disciplinary problems involving them or their firm. All potential investors can check the status and disciplinary history of any registered representative with FINRA at <http://www.finra.org/InvestorInformation/InvestorProtection/InvestorAlerts/index.htm>.

Investors can also request a copy of an Investment Advisor's Form ADV, contact the Better Business Bureau, and any other professional organizations associated with the credential that is displayed. Also, an investor can contact FINRA to access the qualifications for the credential and consider the applicability of the education to your personal issues (<http://apps.finra.org/DataDirectory/1/prodesignations.aspx>). An investor is encouraged to request all applicable reports from an advisor, with the expectation of full disclosure, before services are engaged and any personal information is provided.
